Entering recruits, tested at the Recruit Training Command, Orlando, received either Level D, E, or F of the Gates-MacGinitie Reading Tests which are designed to test individuals with increasingly higher levels of reading proficiency. The purpose of the testing was to relate the recruits' reading ability levels to their Armed Services Vocational Aptitude Battery (ASVAB) scores from the two verbal subtests Word Knowledge and Paragraph Comprehension so that ASVAB (WK+PC) cutoff scores could be derived for assigning a recruit the Gates-MacGinitie test of the appropriate difficulty level. This report suggests that administering level D of the Gates-MacGinitie tests to all recruits does not provide an accurate classificatory scheme. Using three levels of the test will provide accurate reading grade levels for all recruits and will make the Gates-MacGinitie an appropriate screening device for remediation programs at all stages of Navy training. Fourth grade performance on the Connecticut Mastery Tests (CMT) was investigated by examining the performance of 75 students on CMT practice tests of reading and writing, a second test of reading comprehension, decoding, listening comprehension, spelling, and ideation at the end of their third grade year. Decoding and listening comprehension were found to account for 50% of the variance in Degrees of Reading Power (DRP) scores, and spelling and ideation to account for 30% of the variance in writing scores. Spelling was also found to predict reading comprehension, as measured by the DRP and the Gates-MacGinitie Reading Tests (GMRT), and DRP and GMRT scores were found to be highly correlated ($r = .81$). Results support the claim that holistic measures of reading and writing conceal different sources of variation that can only be assessed by analytic measures.
